Signing or Cosigning Liability

When signing a contract you are liable for the entire sum of the debt. When two or more individuals join in a contract obligation, that does not limit their liability to half or whatever percent your portion may represent. All parties are responsible for the whole amount. Per Washington State Contract Law, this is called being jointly and severally responsible.

Translated, this means that if all parties are not equally participating in meeting the debt obligation, we have the option of going after all or any of the obligated parties. This includes cosigners. We make every effort to collect from the offending party, however if they move and we are unable to readily locate them, we have the option of enforcing the lease on the remaining individuals.

Comparisons: If two unrelated parties bought a boat, and had one of the parties parents cosign for the transaction and then defaulted on the loan with a balance owing of $15,000, the Bank would not assess each party a $5,000 collection account. Each party would be assessed the full $15,000 and until the balance was paid in full, it would show up on each individual's credit as the full amount owing at the time.
